

A lot of other people have vivid recollections concerning that store. E. D. Firmage and his brothers served with J. C. Penney for many years and remembers well the early locations. His family has a picture of the first Golden Rule Store.

Next Door Neighbor

Cleo L. Thatcher, well-known Provo woman, has vivid recollections of the Second West block because her father operated a store just west of the Golden Rule.

Cal Bee wrote in Friday's Herald of his memory of the store and related that a Mr. Singleton had a tailor's shop in the building before the Golden Rule moved in.

The late Walter Taylor, whose father was a pioneer photographer in Provo, furnished Mr. Crockett with a picture (reproduced herewith) of the building in the pre-Golden Rule period.

Mrs. Sarah Wride Baker says when she was 6 years old or thereabouts her mother took her to the Golden Rule Store and bought her a dress. The store at that time was at West aid of the premier. "I believe could mediate between him and Nixon very easily."

Cowan would not be able to relax immediately since he said he had a round of television appearances to make.

Another well-publicized member of the team was John Tannehill, 18, of Middleport, Ohio, who was quoted while in China as saying he wanted to remain in the Communist mainland. On arriving in New York with four other team members Sunday, he said he was misquoted.

"I didn't want to stay forever," he said. "I wanted to stay a week or two and learn more about the Chinese people and maybe go on a farm and work there."

He said other members of the team also wanted to extend their visits but the Chinese told them that if the delegation "went in as a whole then the same 15 people would have to leave in order to eliminate any commotion."

Tannehill, a freshman at the University of Cincinnati, said he agreed with the doctrines of
